Improving her patience, waiting for the end-product and the end of the process patiently, maintaining interest.

The experience and efficiency of the second occasion

She was glad to take part in the third lesson; her enthusiasm was unbroken. She was happy to hold the the item done previously and viewed it with satisfaction. Without asking she got down to business that she managed to complete on her own without any mistakes. If any mistakes made she was able to detect them. Sometimes she needed correction at the end of the lines so as to be take over the yarn end-framed. Once I left her continue her work uncorrectly so that she could see how the mistaken filled yarn would slip off the chain yarns if the yarn end-framed is taken over. She managed to decide on the order of the colours in the weaving cycle.

She worked persistently and followed it with interest. She noted again that she was looking forward to finishing this task and going on to a new one, weaving the haversack. We planned and estimated together that we would be able to finish it during our next meeting. It seemed to be an acceptable deadline for her. She said that she would not like to become ill again so that we we could finish the task the next week.
